Better protocols needed to keep classified documents out of wrong house

BIG DIFFERENCES BETWEEN TRUMP, BIDEN, PENCE CASES

By Robert Weiner and Lexi Meola

After classified documents were found in former Vice President Mike Pence's residence, President Joe Biden's personal office and residence, and former President Donald Trump's personal residence, there has been a serious concern over the handling of classified documents when an administration is leaving office.

The National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) has held a long relationship with presidential administrations guiding them when they come into office and when they leave office. However, there seems to be an issue when presidents and vice presidents leave office as they are leaving with classified documents that should be going directly to the NARA.

According to the filing made by the DOJ, Trump "likely concealed and removed" documents from the White House and "efforts were likely taken to obstruct the government's investigation."

After a video of Biden criticizing Trump in an interview over his handling of classified documents, Biden's name was found in a similar headline.

It was then revealed that there were around 10 classified documents found at President Biden's personal office at the University of Pennsylvania and more additional classified documents found at his home in Wilmington, Delaware.

Shortly after Biden's documents, former Vice President Mike Pence was discovered to have classified documents in his residence as well.

There is serious concern over who had access to the documents found in Trump, Biden and Pence's personal spaces.
